ABSTRACT

In the 21st century, with increasing enrollment in higher education, the government invests more in education. However, discordance between population growth and land use has become more intense during city development, and land for campuses has become limited. Thus, in order to seek for better natural environment and larger space, university campuses are compelled to shift to suburbs. Suburbanization is the main trend of universities; most colleges and universities nationwide start building their new campuses in the outskirts of cities. To meet faculty and student needs for teaching, learning, research, and literature on new campuses, and to perform better in assessments of educational administrative departments, a new round of library construction boomed. Of course, economic growth and technological development provide strong material foundation and technical support for the construction of academic libraries.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF LIBRARY CONSTRUCTION ON NEW CAMPUSES

In 2013, there were 134 colleges and universities in Jiangsu province, among which were 51 general universities and 83 higher vocational colleges or specialized colleges. Investigation showed that, from 2001 to 2013, 82 colleges and universities constructed new library buildings in Jiangsu, accounting for 61.2% of all. Among those library buildings, 41 were constructed by 38 general universities, which account for 74.5% of all the general universities. The mean area of the newly-built libraries was 31,800 m², as seen in Table 1.

According to incomplete data from the Steering Committee of Academic Libraries in the Ministry of Education of China, 66 general universities were constructing new library buildings in 2013 nationwide; the total planning area of construction was about 1,667,000 m² and the average area of each library was 25,300 m² (Ministry of Education's University Library Factual Database, 2013, 2014). 94 general universities were constructing new library buildings in 2014, with 2,217,000 m² total planning construction areas and 23,600 m² average construction areas.
