

Chapter 7

Recognizing the Realities and Needs of Unaccompanied Minors in the All-English Classroom

Rebecca E. Linares
Montclair State University, USA

ABSTRACT

This chapter provides key information about a growing population of English language learners (ELLs) in United States classrooms: unaccompanied minors from the Northern Triangle nations of Central America. Part one provides contextual information about unaccompanied minors, including a description of the immigration process that channels children from detention facilities along the U.S.-Mexico border to communities—and classrooms—across the country. Part two draws on empirical data gathered through an ethnographic case study conducted across the 2015–2016 school year and focuses on one pedagogical practice, dialogue journaling, in a classroom serving unaccompanied minors with limited and interrupted formal schooling. Part three provides a list of resources for exploring the topic further including materials that provide a deeper understanding of the sociopolitical contexts in which children cross borders as well as practice-oriented materials teachers can use to create welcoming classroom spaces in which they provide culturally relevant, linguistically accessible instruction.

INTRODUCTION

Child migrants from the Northern Triangle<sup>1</sup> of Central America (NTCA) are labeled many things when they arrive to, and self-surrender or are detained at, the U.S.–Mexico border. They are called alien, unlawful non-citizen, asylum-seeker illegal<sup>2</sup>, and undocumented. Upon enrolling in a school district, they are again labeled many things by school district personnel including Student with Limited or Interrupted Formal Educational Background (SLIFE), Limited English Proficient (LEP), English Language Learner (ELL), newcomer, and other labels that tend to only highlight small aspects of their identities. (For an extensive review of these categorical terms and their connotations, see García & Kleifgen, 2018.) During this labeling process, students' languages, cultures, educational trajectories, and immigration histories are analyzed and interpreted for purposes of classifying, labeling, and placing them in educational programs within the district. While to a certain degree, some level of labeling is necessary for properly placing students within a district and school, it can be easy for the child to get lost underneath these categorizations, particularly when the labels focus on deficit understandings of the bodies of knowledge and linguistic abilities these students already possess when they enroll. This chapter focuses on one specific population of students, those classified as "unaccompanied minors" by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) upon entry into the United States. The purpose of this chapter is to provide teachers and school personnel with information regarding this classification to support them in developing a basic understanding of this population of students' immigration histories and the process through which they have been resettled around the U.S. after self-surrendering or being detained on the U.S. side of the southern border with Mexico.

DOI: 10.4018/978-1-5225-8283-0.ch007

CHAPTER OUTLINE

In my work with pre-service and in-service teachers enrolled in my university courses and professional development workshops over the last few years, I have often been asked, in various forms, how it is that young people from Central America, particularly those from the southern most parts of the region, manage to make it, first, from their home communities to the U.S.'s southern border and, second, from self-surrendering and being detained at the U.S.-Mexico border to classrooms in the Midwestern and Northeastern parts of the U.S. Teachers have also asked me what, exactly, it means for a child to be an unaccompanied minor. These questions illustrate that the categorical terms used to describe students often remain elusive and ambiguous even for those teachers working in bilingual or newcomer classrooms. Through these conversations, I have also learned that teachers often feel they have little idea of what their students' lives were like prior to enrolling at their school and remain unaware of what students' lives are like when they exit their classrooms. In the current era of neoliberal school reforms, with the immense emphasis on "data-driven accountability, the use of Common Core-aligned scripted curricula, and punitive classroom management approaches," teachers are finding themselves overly-tasked and do not feel like there is time in the day for them to have conversations with or get to know their students personally (Nolan, 2015, p. 1). I reference these encounters and questions to contextualize my focus in this chapter on a discussion of the legal backgrounds, immigration experiences, and precarious statuses of unaccompanied minors from NTCA nations and on an instructional practice teachers can begin to implement that would allow them to engage students in meaningful learning while also garner information about students' backgrounds and identities.

In the first part of this chapter, I will provide a definition of the term "unaccompanied minor" and then briefly describe the process—from self-surrender at the national border to resettlement with guardians around the country—through which unaccompanied minors from the NTCA are resettled. This section of the chapter seeks to help teachers and school personnel understand how these students' experiences and realities and their categorization as unaccompanied minors are often products of larger political and cultural processes that have inherently affected their abilities to remain in their home countries.

In the second part of this chapter, I draw on data gathered during a 2015-2016 ethnographic case study I conducted documenting the schooling experiences of multilingual, unaccompanied minors from 22 more pages are available in the full version of this document, which may be purchased using the "Add to Cart" button on the publisher's webpage:

www.igi-global.com/chapter/recognizing-the-realities-and-needs-of-unaccompanied-minors-in-the-all-english-classroom/225998

Related Content

---

In Other Words: What's Happened to Metaphors in the Translation of Political Texts

Yiqing Liu and Caiwen Wang (2021). International Journal of Translation, Interpretation, and Applied Linguistics (pp. 16-30).

www.irma-international.org/article/in-other-words/281670

Examining Oral Performance Characteristics of L2 Learners With the CAF Calculator

Kazumi Matsumoto, Maki Hirotsu and Atsushi Fukada (2020). Recent Tools for Computer- and Mobile-Assisted Foreign Language Learning (pp. 132-148).

www.irma-international.org/chapter/examining-oral-performance-characteristics-of-l2-learners-with-the-caf-calculator/238663

Translation of Wine as a Culture-Bound Term From English Canon Text to a Language of Lesser Diffusion

Joseph Igono (2022). International Journal of Translation, Interpretation, and Applied Linguistics (pp. 1-12).

www.irma-international.org/article/translation-of-wine-as-a-culture-bound-term-from-english-canon-text-to-a-language-of-lesser-diffusion/304078

Linguistic Diversity in Language Teacher Education: Increased Awareness and Identity Transformations Through Fieldwork Experience

Bahar Otcu-Grillman and Jung Kang K. Miller (2022). Global and Transformative Approaches Toward Linguistic Diversity (pp. 188-205).

www.irma-international.org/chapter/linguistic-diversity-in-language-teacher-education/306771

A Linguistic Exploration of Indigenous Languages Adverts: A Critical Discourse Approach

Magret Jongore, Pinkie Phaahla and Rose Masubelele (2019). International Journal of Translation, Interpretation, and Applied Linguistics (pp. 1-11).

www.irma-international.org/article/a-linguistic-exploration-of-indigenous-languages-adverts/232230