

Chapter 2

Prospects of Tourism for Peace: Is Tourism Part of the Problem or the Solution?

Maximiliano E. Korstanje

 <https://orcid.org/0000-0002-5149-1669>

University of Palermo, Argentina

ABSTRACT

Over the years, philosophers have debated the problem of war and peace. Is violence inherently enrooted in our minds? Or simply are we educated in a violent society? Is war a social malady to be eradicated or part of our nature? The myth of Cain and Abel gives some hints on this, but, of course, it does not suffice to explain the complexity of the conflict in the societal order. Humans often are slaves of negative emotions such as rage, fear, greed, and envy. Nonetheless, as Immanuel Kant imagined, a durable and perpetual peace can be internationally achieved, where a tacit agreement is convened among nations. In so doing, they should share a common-grounded constitution and be subject to the law of federation. The figure of hospitality is vital to weave an international pact of cooperation and non-aggression. Here one might question if tourism is part of this panacea, as Kant in his days envisaged.

INTRODUCTION

Over the years, philosophers debated the problem of war and peace. Is violence inherently enrooted in our mind, or are we simply educated in a violent society? Is war a social malady to be eradicated or part of our nature?

Some scholars have agreed that hospitality and peace are inextricably intertwined. One of the pioneering philosophers in focusing on the role of hospitality as an instrument of understanding was Immanuel Kant, who in his days, imagined, a durable and perpetual peace can be internationally achieved whether a tacit agreement is convened among nations. In so doing, they should share a common-grounded constitution and be subject to the law of federation. The figure of hospitality is vital to weave an international pact of cooperation and no-aggression (Kant, 2015). Here one might question, is tourism part of this panacea that Kant envisaged in his days?

DOI: 10.4018/978-1-7998-5053-3.ch002

The dominant discourse within the constellations of tourism research punctuates that the tourism industry emerged in the days after the industrial revolution because of the combination of multiple and complex factors. The political and economic stability not only ensured the acceleration of technological breakthrough but also laid the foundations for the rise and expansion of tourism. In this context, peace was the precondition for the well-functioning of the tourist system (Moufakkir & Kelly, 2010; Sharpley, 2018). Not only peace but also democracy played a leading role in the configuration and consolidation of the tourism industry worldwide (Sandell, 2005; Burns & Novelli, 2007). It is safe to say, at least for these theorists, that undemocratic governments face serious limitations and challenges to promote tourism simply because the necessary economic conditions, which are inherited in the global capitalism, are not given. In this vein, tourism, democracy and capitalism seem to be inevitably entwined. Sasha Pack in a seminal book not only contradicted this thesis but explained clearly how undemocratic governments such as Franco's Spain or Nazi Germany have successfully developed the tourism industry to boost the domestic consumption. Centred on the case of Spain, Pack holds the thesis that tourism has historically and successfully flourished in undemocratic conditions or post-conflict destinations. Pack does not deny that tourism needs stable and peaceful conditions, but her well-documented case shows clearly how tourism can be assertively promoted by bloody dictatorships. This moot point begs some pungent questions such as is tourism an efficient instrument to promote peace?. What is the evidence that sustains this thesis? Is tourism part of the problem or the solution to placate violence?

The present chapter pursues four main goals. Firstly it interrogates on the nature of peace in its connection in what Elias dubbed as a civilizational process. In a second stage, the section reviews publications, where some voices have recently alerted on the complex nature of tourism which under some conditions far from promoting peace, accelerates a process of rivalry and conflict. In third, the specialised literature that discusses post-conflict destinations, as well as the needs of stimulating a dark consumption is widely assessed in the sections of this chapter. Last but not least, some remarks are posed revolving around the agenda for the years to come. This section aims at answering to what extent tourism will be work as a mechanism towards peace or conflict.

PRELIMINARY DEBATE

The fact is that, after all, peace played a crucial role within the constellations of sociology –as well as other social sciences- and government. At a closer look, the founding parents of sociology and anthropology believed that the process of civilisation brought the man from the state of nature back. In so doing, he overly renounced to his atavistic drive to violence. In Hobbesian terms, when lay-people abandons their wildness, law and order are widely embraced and respected. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, this ideological position led European writers to think that aborigines were living in a state of nature while the (European) civilising process should domesticate the native disposing them from their bloody past (Hamowy, 1990; Ivison, 2004). The Hobbesian theory was particularly important after WWII ended, where millions lost their lives. One of the first authoritative voices in questioning such an assertion, doubtless, was Norbert Elias who innovatively acknowledged that the cycles of peace and warfare are ambiguously repeated, fluctuated and accumulated in the line of history. In his influential book “The Civilising Process”, Elias (1978) toys with the belief that violence was an essential part of 11 more pages are available in the full version of this document, which may be purchased using the "Add to Cart" button on the publisher's webpage:

www.igi-global.com/chapter/prospects-of-tourism-for-peace/259262

Related Content

Tourism Search and Metasearch Engines for Online Booking: What Do They Offer?

Trinidad Domínguez, Noelia Araújo, Jose Antonio Fraizand Elisa Alén (2017). Handbook of Research on Holistic Optimization Techniques in the Hospitality, Tourism, and Travel Industry (pp. 67-97).

www.irma-international.org/chapter/tourism-search-and-metasearch-engines-for-online-booking/170953

Recommendation System for Sightseeing Tours

Ricardo Claudino Valadasand Elizabeth Simão Carvalho (2020). International Journal of Tourism and Hospitality Management in the Digital Age (pp. 34-54).

www.irma-international.org/article/recommendation-system-for-sightseeing-tours/259006

Effect of Service Quality on Customer Satisfaction in Selected Cafeterias: A Structural Equation Modeling Approach

Beatrice Atta Mensah, Sylvester Achioand Isaac Ofori Asare (2021). International Journal of Tourism and Hospitality Management in the Digital Age (pp. 1-16).

www.irma-international.org/article/effect-of-service-quality-on-customer-satisfaction-in-selected-cafeterias/269288

Innovative Technologies for Sustainable Food Waste Disposal in Hospitality Operations

Sumit Chhikara, Bhupender Dighliya, Sapna Panwarand Hitesh Kadiyan (2024). Sustainable Disposal Methods of Food Wastes in Hospitality Operations (pp. 269-286).

www.irma-international.org/chapter/innovative-technologies-for-sustainable-food-waste-disposal-in-hospitality-operations/341574

Coastal Management Using UAS and High-Resolution Satellite Images for Touristic Areas

Apostolos Papakonstantinou, Michaela Doukari, Panagiotis Stamatisand Konstantinos Topouzelis (2020). Destination Management and Marketing: Breakthroughs in Research and Practice (pp. 956-975).

www.irma-international.org/chapter/coastal-management-using-uas-and-high-resolution-satellite-images-for-touristic-areas/251089